Action call over dying Dead Sea

By Martin Patience
BBC, in Ein Gedi, southern Israel

Standing close to a grey, concrete building enclosing a spa, Ein Gedi kibbutz member Merav Ayalon points at the brown mudflats a few metres away.

Twenty years ago the Dead Sea water would have lapped at her feet, she says. But now, glittering in the distance, the sea lies almost one km away from the spa.

"We are watching the sea vanishing," says Ms Ayalon. "I feel like the sea is a dying man calling out for help and there's nothing I can do."

In the last 50 years, the Dead Sea, the world's saltiest body of water and lowest point on earth, has seen its surface area shrink by a third and its depth drop by 25 meters.

The water that once flowed into the Dead Sea from the River Jordan has been diverted by Syria, Jordan, Israel for

“I have gone through the plan with Bro. Sulley, verse by verse, and am persuaded that he has reached the divine conception... It is impossible to convey an idea of the grandeur of the architectural details. No such building was ever conceived by man. The biggest building in the world shrinks to a mere outhouse by the side of it, and no such building could be put up by man under present circumstances. As the great architect, Sir Christopher Wren, is reported to have said, ‘It would take the autocratic control of the resources of a universal empire to put it up.’”

A scenic landscape photograph of a mountain valley. In the foreground, a calm lake reflects the surrounding green hills and the blue sky with white clouds. Several tall, dark evergreen trees stand prominently on the grassy slopes. The background features rolling green hills and a prominent mountain peak with some rocky, brownish patches. The overall atmosphere is peaceful and serene.
